Motion capture is a method of creating virtual characters through tracking movements from real-life actors. In EA's case, they will be using the data from 22 professional footballers who fit with the size and weight requirements for the major motion capture suits, which are inflatable latex suits worn by the real-life footballers. While the suits used may well be expensive, you can play the game for free (minus the microtransactions). For motion capture capture, the players have to be restrained to the suits and the suits have to be worn without pads and must be moved as naturally as they are when wearing the suits on the field. 21 games were tested, and the in-game experience was surprisingly similar. The movements were all natural, with the players not looking stiff or unnatural in any way. Here's a video of some other players in action: The reaction times on this was very quick, with little lag and without tearing. There were some minor issues, like the ball being used for real and the players not looking all that realistic, but the issues appear to be very minor. Only the faces, and the boots on the feet, are affected. The new FIFA Soccer game, FIFA 22 has been announced and it's set to come out on August 11, 2018 in stores worldwide, as well as coming to the Epic Games Store. It is the first FIFA in the series to use motion capture for gameplay, a technology EA has used on previous games. Players can also be seen in real-time performance-capture as they play the game, as well as in-game videos that show the motions of the players. In the game, players can now share in-game clips on social networks. According to EA, motion capture data from the players was used to create the realistic in-game clips of the players in motion. Football clubs were used to test the process, and 21 games were captured. The game will be free, and it's available for both PC and Xbox One. EA created an interactive documentary on the game, which you can check out here What do you think of FIFA? Let us know in the comments below and tell us if you plan to play FIFA 22.
