David Burley is one of many current-day students who took part in the historic Montague Common Interim School. "I believe that the school is just as needed today as it was in 1953," Burley said. Burley recently returned to Montague after taking a job as a deputy coroner with the Calcasieu Parish Coroner's office. He remembered being at the school in an entirely different way back then. "I was in the fifth grade, and the teacher asked us to pledge allegiance and present arms, and I said, 'I can't do that.' "There were 20 students in my class, and no one else said that." Burley and his classmates decided they could use their time at the Montague Common Interim School to teach the modern generation a different form of patriotism. "We pledged allegiance to the flag and told them to tell us if we were wrong, and we all said we weren't," Burley said. Now, over 50 years later, the former students from Montague Common Interim School are working to provide a link between the past and the present.
