KeyCharacterization of lymph node micrometastases and associated angiogenesis in cervical carcinoma.
The clinicopathological significance of lymph node micrometastases in cervical carcinoma is unknown. The aim of this study was to determine whether lymph node micrometastases were associated with angiogenesis and to examine the usefulness of image cytometry and microvessel density as markers of node-positive and node-negative cervical carcinoma.

We evaluated the expression of vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) and CD31 in 140 cases of carcinoma, of which 112 were node positive and 28 were node negative.

The microvessel density (MVD) was determined using an image cytometry technique. The micrometastases were detected in 72 out of 112 (64%) node-positive cases. A significantly lower MVD was found in node-positive cases compared with node-negative cases ($P = 0.002$). The MVD was not significantly correlated with the depth of tumour cell invasion and lymphovascular permeation. The sensitivity of image cytometry was significantly higher than that of immunohistochemistry for micrometastases detection and correlated with the MVD ($P = 0.031$). Vascular endothelial growth factor expression was found in 107 out of 112 (96%) node-positive cases. In node-negative cases, however, it was detected in only 22 out of 28 (79%). When comparing VEGF expression in node-positive and -negative cases, the sensitivity was 93 and 79%, respectively ($P = 0.29$) and the specificity was 89 and 83%, respectively ($P = 0.40$). No correlation was found between VEGF and MVD. VEGF immunohistochemistry was found to be a powerful marker of advanced tumour stage. CD31 showed no correlation with the MVD in our study. The characteristics of lymph node micrometastases in patients with cervical carcinoma may be associated with tumour biology and indicate that angiogenesis may play a part in nodal metastases.
