Life is unpredictable. To be successful, you need to be able to adapt your responses to change. You need to be able to deal with the unexpected while also using the skills you learn to adapt to new situations. This is accomplished through a process of learning that has two components. The first is the process of obtaining new information from the environment. The second is the process of incorporating the new information into your plans or strategies of dealing with the environment. Of course, it does no good if you spend your time just learning about the new situation. You must also use what you know to solve problems, establish routines and become effective. When you handle yourself and your environment effectively, you will get positive results. Human plasma cells deplete exosomes during differentiation into an antibody-producing state. Antibodies are assembled in the endoplasmic reticulum (ER) and later exported to the cell surface for ligand binding. Exosomes released into the blood are primarily derived from cells with plasma membranes. Here, we show that in vitro differentiated plasma cells deplete exosomes from their secreted pool, most likely during the process of maturation to a cell type able to export
